

Tephrochlamys tarsalis

The gena below the eye is narrow and grey, with extensive dark setae

A detailed dorsal view of the fly Tephrochlamys tarsalis. The head is brown with large, reddish-brown compound eyes. The thorax is grey and densely covered with dark, fine hairs (setae). The abdomen is a light tan color. The wings are transparent with visible venation. The legs are yellowish-brown and also covered in dark setae. An arrow points from the text box to the gena area below the eye.

Tephrochlamys flavipes

The gena below the eye is white, with sparser black setae

A detailed dorsal view of the fly Tephrochlamys flavipes. The head is brown with large, reddish-brown compound eyes. The thorax is grey and covered with sparser black setae compared to T. tarsalis. The abdomen is a light tan color. The wings are transparent with visible venation. The legs are yellowish-brown and also covered in dark setae. An arrow points from the text box to the gena area below the eye.